Private Credit for Retail Investors: Promises and Risks

Exposure of Japanese savings to US private credit is rising rapidly just as that market is changing. This lecture asks what Japanese investors are actually buying: how the promises of higher income and stable returns hold up against the evidence, whether today's risks are systemic, and why Japanese holders face redemption limits that bind twice and fees that leave them behind US investors. It closes with the prospects for private credit in Japan, where the larger prize may be modern credit underwriting.
